Obtaining Articles from Harvard Business Review

Some people regard the peer reviewed journal Harvard Business Review (HBR) as the “gold standard” for business articles. Some business professors expect and even require students to use HBR articles for their assignments.

If you need a copy of an article from the HBR, submit your request to the library’s Interlibrary Loan (ILL) Department at ill@friends.edu. Because the library has the papercopy issues of this journal from 1924 to the present, the ILL Department will scan the article and e-mail it to you within 72 hours at no charge.

If you want to search for articles on a certain subject in HBR, search the library’s best business database ABI/INFORM by subject. The results of a search will give you citations and abstracts (summaries) of HBR articles from late 1971 through the most recent issue. Use the e-mail tool inside ABI/INFORM to e-mail yourself the citation for the article you want. After you receive the e-mail, forward it to the ILL Department at ill@friends.edu, and be sure to add your name, address, phone number, preferred e-mail address, and your status. Sending the citation to yourself first results in your knowing right away if the computer system did not deliver the citation properly. If you do not receive the citation, you will have to convey the citation to the ILL Department using a different method. As noted above, the ILL Department will scan the article and e-mail it to you within 72 hours at no charge.

Whenever you submit a request to the ILL Department, you need to include the following:
- your name, address, city, state, and zip code
- your phone number
- your preferred e-mail address
- your status (undergrad, grad, faculty, staff, DCP, or PACE)

You may submit a request via e-mail or through USPS mail.

You must provide the ILL Department with a complete citation for the article:
- article author
- article title
- magazine, journal, or newspaper title
- volume number
- issue number
- page numbers
- date
- source (where you found the information)

If you do not have all these pieces of information, give the ILL Department everything that you do have. Please keep in mind that an incomplete citation may limit the ILL Department’s ability to obtain the article you need.

If you need assistance, call the library at 316-295-5880 (800-794-6945 x5880) and ask for the ILL Department. You may also e-mail the library at askmax@friends.edu.
